The particulars of the accident, as given sengers and trainmen, are as follows: Ankenytown the freight, No. 92, engine No. 210, Engineer Tomlinson, had taken the siding to allow No. 9 to pass. The engine and mail car and a coach with passengers passed over the switch all right. The baggage car turned in on the witch, carrying with it two couches and two blowing up with dynamite the clothing house of J. C. leepers. The baggage car struck engine No. 210 and was smashed to smithereens, while the first ch, crowded with passengers on their way home from the G. A. R. Encampment, was piled

As soon as the collision occurred, there prisoners, including Ishak-Khan's father-in-law, Passingers were piled upon each other, solded, cut, and disfigured in the most frightted manner.

The escaping steam, with the agenting shrinks and greats of the wounded, added terrs to the seed of the factor of the passengers couldn't tell how they got out. That every passenger in the first tell that the passengers couldn't tell how they got out. That every passenger in the first ten was not tilled outright is a mirror acid of the wounded.
